Another earlier investigation by Ruitenberg and van der Klok (1966) showed the existence of a corticonigral projection in the monkey. In a later study (Ruitenberg, 1966) it was shown that this projection is present in the monkey, but not in the cat. nigral projection. Although there is a corticonigral projection, there is no substantia nigra degeneration study (Ruitenberg, 1969) in the cat. In recent studies, labeled cells in the prefrontal cortex project to the substantia nigra (Bunney and Bunney, 1979). In a recent study, labeled cells in the prefrontal cortex project to the substantia nigra (Bunney and Bunney, 1979). In a recent study, labeled cells in the prefrontal cortex project to the substantia nigra (Bunney and Bunney, 1979).

Recently, an unexpected source of afferents to the substantia nigra appears to be the subthalamic nucleus. This has traditionally been considered to receive afferents from the external pallidal segment and to project back upon the internal segment of the globus pallidus (see below). Several authors have, however, reported a substantial number of labeled cells in the subthalamic nucleus following injections of horseradish peroxidase in the substantia nigra (Kanazawa, Marshall, and Kelly, 1976; Tulloch, Arbuthnott, and Wright, 1978; Grofová, 1979). In a recent autoradiographic study in the cat and the monkey, Nauta and Cole (1978) confirmed the existence of apparatus pass directly to the cerebellum. Some afferent impulses coming to the body follow fairly simple routes, since some cells in the spinal cord give rise directly to the cerebellum (dorsal and ventral spinocerebellar tracts). The afferent spinal pathways to the cerebellum, however, have additional relay stations in the brainstem. These relay stations include the inferior olive and several nuclei in pathways leading from other regions of the brain (the cerebellum, etc.) to the cerebellum. For this reason it is necessary to describe these relay stations and the routes in which they are used. We will describe the following according to the cerebellar fiber systems (from the appropriate also because...

Thus, as shown in the anterior part of the cerebellum and in the caudal part of the anterior lobe, the paramedian lobule (the lateral part of the anterior lobe) is "representative" of the paramedian lobule (the lateral part of the anterior lobe). It is to be noted that in the middle part of the vermis (overlapping the face areas) where action potentials occur following optic stimuli. Further studies demonstrated that the same somatotopy of the cerebellum could be activated by stimulation of the corresponding area in the sensorimotor region of the contralateral cerebral cortex (Adams, 1967).
